wax, ivory, silver, or earth, and placed in the penetralia or innermost part of the house, were never taken forth as the lares were, and offerings of wine, incense, fruits, and sometimes of animals, were made to them. The Lares and Penates are sometimes regarded as the same, but they are usually thus distinguished. The Penates were of divine origin, the Lares of human; certain persons admitted to the worship of the Lares were not admitted to that of the Penates. The Penates were worshipped only in the innermost part of the house, the Lares also in the public roads, in the camp, and on the sea. The offerings made to each were different, and the homage paid to the Penates was greater than that paid to the Lares. See Adam's Roman Antiqu. and Anthon's Lempriere, articles LARES, PENATES.—Genius, the Daemon or tutelary god who was supposed to take care of every one from his birth during the whole of life. Places and cities also had their particular Genii.

LIBERTINUS, a, um, adj. (libertus). I. Adj.: Belonging to l.: number of those that have obtained their freedom; l. plebs, Plin. II. Subst.: Libertinus, i. m. One that has obtained his freedom, a freedman.—Libertina, æ. f. A freedwoman, Hor. SYN. LIBERTINUS; LIBERTUS. Anciently these words were applied to different persons, as follows: Libertus, one who had been made free. Libertinus, the son of that freedman. Afterwards they were applied to the same person to express a difference of relation; thus: Libertinus, a freedman, with regard to his condition, now free, though not so born.—Libertus, a freedman, with regard to the master who manumitted him. When that master died the freedman was no longer libertus, but he was always libertinus. Thus Cicero says, Trebonius fecit heredem libertum suum; and soon after, equiti Romano libertinus sit haeres. He calls him libertum because he had been a slave to Trebonius, and libertinus to point out his actual situation. Libertino patre natus, Hor. said of himself.
